The plan for 12,300 homes seems excessive.

Already there are serious congestion issues and without major investment in the infrastructure, creating more homes will only make a bad situation worse. The road network simply cannot cope.

Surely the strategy should reflect the changing shopping patterns to out of town locations. This means more of the central areas should become residential. There must be opportunities for this in Warwick and Leamington.

If more houses are required there are many brown field sites that should be the first for additional houses.

The villages have already been blighted by excessive development. In Barford a number of areas have properties crammed into a small space. These have a detrimental effect on the village, while at the same time the council does not rectify a visually unattractive property in a central location.
